My Favorite Communication Memories

Over the course of my 17 years of doing animal communication, I've come across some interesting animal characters and stories. I never know how the animal will react when I do my introduction. For those that don't know, I energetically reach out to the animal and introduce myself and explain why I'm communicating with them, who asked me to communicate, and if they are willing to talk to me. Sometimes they are excited (and start talking 90mph), sometimes they are shy, sometimes scared, and sometimes they wonder if they are in trouble.

The other interesting thing that happens when I reach out is how the animal sounds in my mind. I do hear a voice in my head, which is not my inner voice. Sometimes they are what you would expect, like a little dog speaking in a high-pitched squeaky voice. And sometimes it is totally unexpected such as a terrier who spoke in a very proper tone, complete with English accent or a parrot who sounded like Barry White. Because of the number of communications that I've done over the years I may recall bits of pieces of conversations, but only a few hold a permanent place in my memory. I thought it would be fun to share two of those stories.

The first was a communication with an older small poodle who was physically blind and hard of hearing. Luckily the communication process takes place telepathically, so after my introduction she was more than happy to talk. I answered general questions that her person had, but the dog kept bringing something up that she wanted her person to know. She wanted me to tell her person that she liked her pretty pink toenails. Mind you, she was sitting across from me and her toenails were not pink when I was speaking to her. As you might guess I was a little reluctant to say this for fear of sounding like a crazy person. But I've learned to trust what I get, so I relayed the message. Her person, and best friend who was sitting in on the reading, started cracking up. Unbeknownst to me, the best friend had baby sat the dog a few weeks prior and had painted her toenails pink during their sleepover. So although the dog could not physically see she had pink toes, she was told repeatedly how cute she looked with her pink toes and that made her feel special so she wanted her person to know.

The second involves my son. Like everyone, we get the occasional bug in our house and since my son does not want them harmed, it is his job to take the bugs outside. One evening, I noticed a wolf spider in the house, so I called my son over to catch it and take it out. He put a cup over the spider and tried to coax it up the side of the cup. The spider was not cooperating, so he turned and asked me to communicate with the spider. After a brief chuckle, I figured why not, so I repeatedly sent an image to the spider of him climbing up the side of the cup and then being placed on a plant outside. I got a two word response back and could not contain my laughter. His response "bite me." After relaying this to my son, who also laughed, he put a piece of paper under the cup and took the cranky spider outside.

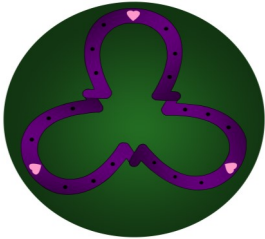

Hope you enjoyed the stories. Who knows, maybe yours will be a future memory that I can't forget.
